

In the current cacophony, the crucifix re-emerges for many as a meaningful symbol. The Christ of the Gospels understood how his crucifixion would function as an attractor. "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all things to me". The universal experience of suffering misunderstanding and abuse in spite of maintaining "good intentions", finds ready referencing in a man of love hanging on a cross of contradiction.

It is well to look at the structural stability of the crucifix itself. The totally non-foetal openness of the figure depends for its openness on being nailed hands and feet to the cross. By contrast, as discussed above, the Buddha lotus position maintains a self-referencing stability in the balanced positioning of the legs. This enables the hands to open to the other without stigmata.

We can note also that the cross itself is a homeomorph of the x/y coordinates of Euclidean space. Nails maintain a man at the center.

This pattern of man depending on a fixed relation to an "external" object for his psychic stability has recurring homeomorphs in the West. It is a pattern that seems to have much to do with Western man's ability to tolerate and desire technological development. The emotional "software" set of a man driving his car, a set configured by the advertising chreods* of capitalism, can be taken as a homeomorph of Christ on the Cross.

In our current state of disillusionment with "technological progress", we might say that Evil Knievel, leaping across a private canyon on a jet-propelled motorcycle because life is boring, is a technological reductio ab absurdum of Christ on the Cross.

Fuller's dictum, "reform the environment, don't reform man", moves in a similar hardware—software vein. Fuller's great utopian vision depends for its stability on the stability of his geometric structures. Re-engineer the environment, and man's ability to get along with his fellow man will be stabilized in utopian fashion. In his vision there is little appreciation of the need to restructure the primitive emotions.

This Christian code has its consequence in the realm of intimacy. Love becomes impossible without taking the cross into the realm of the intimate. In his book Maria Cross, Conor Cruise O'Brien skillfully describes this phenomenon in terms of the imaginative patterns of eight Catholic writers, including Mauriac, Bernanos, Greene, O'Faolain, Claudelle and Bloy. With appropriate qualifications about generalizing, O'Brien nevertheless articulates the central theme of their writing as follows. "Woman is the cross". Then more precisely, "Woman becomes mother and that is the cross". Charges of male chauvinism are readily acknowledged. All the writers are male. Patterns of crucifying the beloved in the realm of intimacy are mutual. We know not how not to cause pain.

*Chreods—Structures which describe and support a process.

Referencing pain is a most difficult process. Neurologically, no nerve net is exempt from pain. Physicians tell us that amputees cannot think of their pain without imagining the missing limb. The wounds of life are extremely difficult to understand in terms of source of affliction. Yet the signal system of pain is part of our experience. We tend to hold onto our pain as a way to ground our knowledge of our experience. We know because it hurts, and perhaps the remembrance of the hurt will enable us to avoid a recurring hurt.

The cross is a crude referencing system for pain. A wooden image of a double bind. As a compelling chreod, however, it tends to attract all phantom pain in search of referencing. People fall into patterns of trading on pain. Pain is reified and dealt by pain merchants.

This distortion has its converse in what the psychiatric profession refers to as sado-masochism. People refusing to resign themselves passively to an impoverished realm of crucified intimacy will strike out or invite being struck. The cross becomes transformed into a club. In McLuhan's exquisite phrase—"violence is a lust for compensatory feedback".

No one managed to save him."*

The man was overdosed on love.
Nobody could handle it.

ACUPUNCTURE

Acupuncture is a Chinese medical therapy antedating Christianity by about two thousand years. The theory is that pathologies in the body result from disequilibrium with the universe. The equilibrium of the body is normally maintained by 365 channels that pass through the body and correspond to the harmony in the universe. These channels also correspond to 365 points related to the body's neural network known to the practitioners of acupuncture. Different pathologies are healed by the tender and attentive insertion of pins into the appropriate set of points on the body at the appropriate time. This results in a gestalt of neural excitement that cleanses the pathology and realigns the body with the harmony of the universe. Note that the human body is not considered as "central" but as "part of" the universe.

The self-processing through videotape discussed earlier allows one to think of self not as center on a private axis, but as part of a trial and error nexus of shifting information pathways. This is true in terms beyond the actual contexts in which taping of "self" is done.
